THE SECRETARIAT

The Secretariat is an administrative profession which is in charge of organizing another employee's or civil servant's files, phone calls, meeting reports drafting, and work schedule management. It frees from some activities particularly by involving in the coordination of its tasks, etc.

An executive secretary assists an executive department, a hierarchy manager or a prosecutor in a court.

The terms "first secretariat", "general secretariat" "private secretariat" "secretariat of state" refer to a different vocation: it indicates a high ranking member (entity) in the hierarchy.

Everlasting, the secretariat job has evolved significantly. Before now, it was the person being able to type rapidly in the computer (and being able to do shorthand, if necessary). When Laptop (personal computers) spread over, the secretary's job has significantly evolved. : People type their texts themselves, and secretaries cover other different tasks.

From renaissance to the end of nineteen century, some men who assume the secretary profession are committed in managing the daily correspondence, and activities of ranking members in the society.
Gradually, the terms refer to many and different vocations, which leads to attributing hybrid vocations in order to define the different secretarial tasks, such as general secretariat, or financial secretariat. Then, the term "secretary" is being used, either as an acronym when the context of the vocation is explicit or to indicate an important occupation.
At the end of the nineteen century, capitalism expands: industries are developing in size, shops are becoming malls, great banking and insurance societies emerge, which require more significant administrative offices especially with the secretariat which is managed by men.

TEXT:

Education in Africa is perishing. No one is unaware. This happens especially through the inability of the educational system to train citizens that can meet the needs of the society. Some think that it's mainly because the teaching programmes are out of line with the hopes of this latter. That is why school reforms follow one another without really bringing sustainable solutions. However, the more time flies, the more the system is spoiling: the number of students in classes are much more exceeding, hard working conditions, the teachers' background even more controversial, given that they are not always teaching subjects for which they have been trained. Students' level is often poor, and most of them obtain their degrees fraudulently. Added to that, the failure in mastering the language transmission and knowledge acquisition, namely in the French language.

The required use of French language as a mean of teaching is an incongruity in a context culturally influenced by African languages. Why not render the most used language a knowledge transmission? More than half a century after the continent gained independence, is it really reliable to continue talking of colonial heritage to assert our own weaknesses, our own moral, political, and intellectual wretchedness?

Indeed, we cannot ignore the efforts that are constantly updated by old cities to influence the world linguistically, hence culturally. Yet, is it necessary for people that were formerly dominated to resign and comply with their diktat? Shall they not free from the burden of this heritage, in order to pave their own path by fashioning their mode of knowledge transmission, according to the requirements of the context where they are evolving?

Another incongruity is the fact that the teacher's and student's French is not always the one of the book. When French books used in our schools are compiled elsewhere, they struggle to recommend a type of texts in a standard language, even formal.

Mukala kadima - Jeune Afrique

TEXT: The school and certificates are losing their value nowadays

The colonisers thought their power was endless, and suddenly, they had to re-embark: By a decision, simple executive agents too were promoted to senior designers. At least for a while, the school that trained them has remained and was built as a reference and continued performing on the same line. Whereas it's a natural view that anything that doesn't evolve, shrink over the time.

Once the colonisers left, they had to replace them off the cuff. There were vacancies. One needed to occupy them. The school trained plenty of substitutes. Such a certificate gave such a rank. It was easy, secured, and reliable. The degree turned into king. What do I say? Deity. It was venerated; a pedestal was fashioned for it. No one thought either over time, or the foreseeable future. The school, supplying senior substitutes, secretively became the factory of certificates. The degree being officially known as a high criteria of competence, poor quality first, followed by the weakness hidden on the degree, became the proficiencies cautioned by the school decree.

Nowadays, we believe less on the deity of certificates. By virtue of the natural principle that everything is essentially reversible, when it reaches its maximum expansion. The degree had its time to shine, and shined brightly; a real firework. Gradually, it has decreased. Are we witnessing a certificate downfall? Yet, the general certificate of education is now a donkey's certificate. Can we successfully convey enough genuine brains to cease the process of diminishing?

Nowadays, education is now an excuse, an excuse for certificates. For, we cannot hand them out conveniently by decree, as we do with the state benefits, school remained an inevitable doorway. As a result, the certificate has been subjected to business affair, the certificate has lost its essence, hence its value. However, change should be made, it must be done.

We need to look around us. Millions of youths besiege classrooms. It's a swelling tide which expands. We are still telling them to move ahead. The tidal wave is ready to sweep away the levees. What will they find at the end of their background? These certificates could really be of less use to them.

I enjoy going round to witness the moments of thunderous joy or heart rending sorrows when the exams results are out, watching the candidates weeping for joy, or lamenting on their failure. All this feeling of excitement allows me to estimate the extent of the scam. We have the impression to witness a drama performance, when we know that the one who weeps for joy is not certainly more skilled than the one who mourns of dissatisfaction. People who pull the strings are carefully hidden behind the scene. When does the drama end? So that real things begin.
